mentioned that he twice performed an operation in which he successfully tied the innominate artery, pointing out that few surgeons could claim to have done this even once (1). The Age noted that he was acknowledged among his brethren of the lancet and scalpel as having attained to an eminent degree of skill in the surgical art (2).

The Herald spoke of "a warm-hearted and generous man" who was always willing to help the poor when needed (3). This testimony to his philanthropy was echoed in the Legislative Council when one member, Mr. W.A. Zeal, stated that

To his own knowledge, the late Dr. Beaney had done numberless good works, which were never known to the public, for the benefit of the poor and suffering (4).

This generosity, though not his modesty, was characteristic of Beaney and mentioned in all of the obituaries. Zeal admitted that Beaney's good works were "surrounded perhaps by some little tinsel of vanity" (5). Table Talk also praised his generosity but criticised the "aggressive way in which (it was) advertised" (6). Only the obituary in the Medical Press was unconditionally critical to the last, claiming that Beaney's of the 1880s his ambition for fame had to a large extent been satisfied and the termination of his partnership with Bailliere had ensured that there was no repetition of the types of unprofessional conduct of which he had been guilty in the previous decade.

Beaney died on 30 June, 1891 at his house in Collins Street. He had been suffering from hepatic disease for two years and finally succumbed to serous cerebral effusion (1). His decline had apparently been prompted by a cold contracted whilst waiting to give evidence as a witness in a marital case in November, 1890 and this developed into lumbago and muscular rheumatism (2). This illness became serious but after taking a holiday he did recover temporarily. He carried on working but developed the old symptoms and subsequently died (3).

Obituaries were printed in the Age, Argus, Illustrated Australian News, Leader, Town and Country Journal, Table Talk, AMG and Herald, but not, significantly, in the AMJ. In the main they recounted a brief history of his life and recorded the bequests he made in his lifetime and in his will. The Illustrated Australian News, the Leader and the Age all commented favourably on his skill as a surgeon and specifically
