ARCH CANT 23 : 1898

SHURLAND HOUSE.

BY REV. J. CAVE-BROWNE, M.A.

THE Isle of Sheppey would seem to have comprised two Manors, that of Shurland representing the paramount Lordship, while that of Northwode occupied a mesne position, the former combining the entire island, for the earliest recorded holder of it was styled "Jordanus de Scapeia," as being Lord of Sheppey. A descendant of his, Sir Stephen, assumed the name of Northwode, having apparently taken up his abode in that manor-house; and to his descendant, Sir John de Northwode, and his wife Joan the still remaining brasses in the Church of Minster are ascribed, though they were long believed to have been to the memory of his father, Sir Roger de Northwode, who had been a very liberal benefactor to the Abbey and the Church.

But the glory of the Northwode branch seems to have been always subordinated to, and was soon to be eclipsed by, the greater eminence of the House of Shurland, in whom our interest at present centres.* The first member of this branch which rose to any distinction was Sir Jeffery de Shurland, who was in high favour with Henry I.; but it was his son, Sir Robert de Shurland, who gave the great notoriety to the name, whose monument, with the strange accompaniment of the horse's head, has been fully described in the account of the Abbey Church.†

Now if we could attach any reliance to the record given by a very popular chronicler—or rather graphic, if somewhat imaginative, expositor of our old chronicles—Tom Ingoldsby,‡ this Sir Robert de Shurland was a most redoubtable Knight,

* This Paper was read in the hall of Shurland House on the occasion of the Archæological Congress in 1896.

† Vol. XXII., p. 157.
